The medical scientists who conducted the experiment were able to reveal many similarities between the behaviors of mice with the PTEN gene deleted and the behaviors of people with autism. The abnormal mice involved in the experiment showed a lot more interest in various objects rather than in other mice. They also became passive, and withdrawn, avoiding any form of interaction with other mice. They began to show signs of poor adaptability, failing to integrate into new environments.

Also, the mice with the deleted gene became stressed when confronted with new situations, unlike normal mice, which didnt experience difficulties in adapting to unknown scenarios. The major difference, however, was that unlike autistic people, the abnormal mice didnt show any signs of repetitive behaviors or insistence on sameness.
